JEMPHIS APPEAL

THE THOROTOGRFARE. All day I watched the boay crowds. That press along the street, Have heard, like ratur-drops on the roof. The sounds of falling feet; From morn till slight that tide of life. Frows like a coareless stream, lake to those numeless shadowy throngs, which pass us in our dream. To those who've walked some crowded street
Where strengers come and go
lake shadow—heedless whom you meet,
No face that you know,
I need not tell that 'inide! the crowd
Which througed the streets to-lay,
You might have seen the young, the old,
The sarrowful, the gay.

For you, like I, have marked such crowds, Have read them like a book; And in the flushed and haggard face, The frown be smile, the look. Have read the secrets of the soul-Have seen the found dusire For wealth and f-me cak added there, And burning like a fire. You have upon that street, perchance, Akeye to eye you met Some beauty whose bewildering ginnee Jwells in your memory yet; You there have read the sentiment on there have read also.
Of joyousness and gles,
pon the pages of that heart;
They were not writ for thes. And on that wan and haggird brow
Have rind how sorrow a lings
Have pierced the breast and torn the heart;
What croed, letter panys
Mistorium's rathless hand hath given;
What powarty, what tears—
The breat bereft, and hope all crushed,
The fulure nought but lears.

Business and pleasure, toll and rest,
Hath each its surfor here,
And some 10-18y the stree's have pressed
Who'll weep when night appears.
I know not whence they come, nor where
Their eager steps will thrust;
I know but this: they go at length,
At last, to death—to dust. And other crowds will press these streets
For inera, love and love;
Others will frown, and length and weep
W. on washall weep no more.
The children of that coming day—
A batter day, I trust—
Will little reck how sound we sleep,
Who've gone, to death—to dust.
